A Critical Analysis of the Quad -Segments in “Train to Pakistan,” an Epoch-making Novel by Khushwant Singh

Dr. Veena Radheshyam Ilame

Assistant Professor, Department of English, Anna Saheb Gundewar College Nagpur-440013, Maharashtra, India

Abstract— This research paper aims to explore “Dacoity”, “Kalyuga” (the Age of Downfall), “Mano-Maira” (Dirty-Mind) and “Karma” (Deeds) in “Train to Pakistan”, an epoch-making novel inscribed by Khushawant Singh and critically analyse those four phases in the fiction. The Partition of India is the gloomiest occurrence in British India, which attracted the attention of several writers, poets, and novelists who portrayed it in their respective works. Khushwant Singh expresses his anger over the violation of the long-cherished Indian values over the communal riots that occurred over the process of the Partition of United British India into India and Pakistan. It can be argued that “Train to Pakistan”, a tragedy inscribed in a mock-comic form, heaps up pieces of criticism over the celebration of the freedom attained with mass murder, bestiality and ingeniously, delineating the pity and horror of the two-nation theory, and it is a nightmare with a thrilling texture which one closes the novel with a sigh of relief.

Keywords— Age, anger, bestiality, Dacoity, Dirty, Downfall, Deeds, gloomiest, Khushwant, horror, India, murder, nation, Occurrence, pity, Pakistan, Partition, riots, Singh, two, theory Train, violation values.

I. INTRODUCTION

It is this that the partition of British India is seemingly the gloomiest occurrence in the history of Modern India, fascinating the consideration of a horde of creative writers and poets, and these have strived to express the themes of Partition because of their viewpoint. With Train to Pakistan, Khuswant Singh has proven himself as an illustrious Indian writer “with an individual status in modern Indo-Anglian Literature” (Sahane 344). He attained this uniqueness owing to his fury and disillusionment with the “long-cherished human values in the wake of inhuman bestial horrors then insane savage killings on both sides during the partition of the subcontinent between India and Pakistan in August 1947” (Raizada 126). It is possible to argue that the events were a blot on the fair name of Indianness and Indian culture, a long-cherished notion in the Indian subcontinent.

The introduction of the paper should explain the nature of the problem, previous work, purpose, and the contribution of the paper. The contents of each section may be provided to understand easily about the paper.

II. FOUR PHASES

It is what V. A. Sahane, the author, editor, and critic divides the novel Train to Pakistan suggests into four phases: Dacoity, Kalyuga, Mano Majra and Karma, and this paper attempts to make a critical analysis of the four phases of Khuswant Singh’s epoch-making novel Train to Pakistan. According to Sahane, the novel has four sections (a) Dacoity, (b) Kalyuga, (c) Mano Majra, and (d) Karma.

In the first section “Dacoity,” the novelist introduces the central theme, subtly hinting at the catastrophic circumstances both natural and social, which preclude the tragic events that follow the central event of partition. In the second section “Kaliyuga,” he points out how every code of life is disturbed and how everything becomes topsy-turvy. Kaliyuga becomes Kali-yuga, the age of Kali, the Mother of death and destruction. In the third section, “Mano Majra,” Mr. Singh goes on to show how the peaceful atmosphere of Mano Majra, a small village at the border of India and Pakistan becomes the seat of communal suspicion, tension, hatred, and violence. In the last section, “Karma,” the writer invokes the Law of Karma, which is central to the Indian view of life, to explain the mysterious ways of human destiny in the backdrop of the crescendo of action and feelings that rise and fall in the disturbing world of the novel.

The portrayal of the Phases in the Novel:

The novel commences with a murky and grim note of violence and butchery. It has something of the kind of Shakespearean tragedy about it. Mr. Singh mentions that the summer of 1947 was an infrequent summer with an altered feel. “It was drier and dustier” (Singh 1), as well as “longer,” with a late monsoon which brings only the shadows of “sparse clouds” (Singh 1) without rain. It is suggested that he devotes his depiction with symbolic implications to submit the anguish that was to the following Partition. It unprecedented weather foreboded something ill besides made the people of the village a little uneasy so much so that they began “to say that God was punishing them for their sins” (Singh 1). Some of these people believed “that they had sinned” (Singh 1).

After revealing the unusual weather Mr. Singh goes on to give a brief description of the communal situation of the country, especially the riots of Calcutta and Noakhali, attempts of the communal forces to whet the communal frenzy in the west, and the evacuation and migration of millions of people uprooted from their land. The violence that started in Calcutta swept the country and tortured people. Khuswant Singh vividly describes the tragic scene:

It shows that hundreds of thousands of Hindus and Sikhs who had lived for centuries on the Northwest frontier forsaken their homes and fled towards the protection of the predominantly Sikh and Hindu communities in the east. They traveled on foot, by the summer of 1947... Ten million people – Muslims and Hindus and Sikhs were in flight. By the time the monsoon broke, almost a million of them were dead, and all of northern India was in arms, in terror, or hiding. (Singh 1-3)

III. COMMUNAL RIOTS

However, in the desert of communal destruction, there were some oasis of communal peace and harmony and seats of the composite culture. One of these places was the tiny border village of Mano Majra, situated about a mile south of a railroad bridge on the Sutlej. In the village of seventy families, there was only one Hindu family of Lala Ram Lal, and other families belonged to Sikhs and Muslims about equal in number. There were also a few families of sweepers whose religion was uncertain. Although these communities had their separate places of worship, there was an object of common worship, a three-foot slab of sandstone that stood upright a keekar tree beside the pond. It was the local deity, the deo to which all the villagers—Hindu, Sikh, Muslim or pseudo-Christian repaired secretly whenever they were in special need of blessing” (Singh 6). It was the symbol of communal harmony in the village.

This fact seems to indicate that the inhabitants of Mano Majra, lived in an idyllic atmosphere in the lap of bountiful nature. It is well reflected in the fact that they still enjoyed a cordial relationship, which has been prevailing between them, for many centuries. They are hardly aware of the meaning of Partition. They did not know this even when the British partitioned their country and left India forever. They did not even realize the impact of such things on the tenor of their life until a train carrying dead bodies arrives from Pakistan.

It is believed that, in the pre-partition days, the Mano Majrians enjoyed the better of the two worlds of nature and machine. The movement of trains across the Sutlej Bridge situated nearby the railway station at Mano Majra regulates the rhythm of life of the village largely. With the departure of the last train, the life of the village is lulled to sleep and with the arrival of the mail train, the life of the village starts stirring. Besides, the mornings and the evenings of the village regularly reverberate with the echoes of Mullah’s cries of ‘Allah O Akbar’ and those of the Sikh priests’ prayers. The regularity and punctuality of the passenger trains and goods train through Mano Majra indicate the regular and smooth rhythm of the village life.

IV. OCCURRENCE OF DISTURBANCE

However, this atmosphere of a perfect life was disturbed by the encroachment of evil, which became instrumental in breaking the moral code of their social life. On one heavy night of August, Malli, the gangster came along with his four companions to loot Lala Ram Lal who was eventually stabbed by one of the robbers. Even though it was not a communal murder, it precluded what was in the offing. It heralded the end in Mano Majra was symbolic of not only the breach of social code but also a master playwright. the novelist goes on to introduce the idyllic love-scene followed by a sex-encounter between the Sikh-criminal Jugga or Juggut Singh and his Muslim beloved Nooran, the daughter of the local Muslim priest, as an interlude of comic relief to prepare readers to endure the tragic experience of the following days. The love between the two persons of different religions is symbolic in the sense that it is love division and that triumphs over violence and that through it one can overcome the evil of communalism. At this stage, Khuswant Singh too adds another dimension to the communal theme by introducing Iqbal Singh a western educated unripe communist, deputed by the party to create political consciousness amongst the ignorant peasants of the village. Eventually, the police arrested both Jugga and Iqbal Singh, Jugga for the murder of Lala Ram Lal and Iqbal for being a Muslim Leaguers engaged in generating communal frenzy.

Meanwhile, the fact remains that the news of atrocities committed by the Muslims in Pakistan on Hindu and Sikh communities began to pour in, disturbing people of India, especially Punjab. Even the police officer appeared concerned with what was happening on the other side of the border, as one of the police officers remarked:

. . . ‘it was the Muslim police taking sides which made the difference in the riots. Hindu boys of Lahore would have given the Muslims hell if it had not been for their police. They did a lot of Zulum.’ ‘Their army is like that, too. Baluch soldiers have been shooting people whenever they were sure there was no chance of running into Sikh or Gurkha troops.’ (Singh 91-92)

In the second section, “Kalyuga,” the late-running trains suddenly changed the peaceful rhythm of life of Mano Majra, which in turn became instrumental in disturbing the life of the village. This disturbance was further enhanced by the arrival of the ghost trains. Singh writes:

The arrival of the ghost train in broad daylight created a commotion in Mano Majra. People stood on their roofs to see what was happening at the station. All they could see was the blacktop of the train stretching from one end of the platform to the other. The station building and the railings blocked the rest of the train from view. Occasionally a soldier or a police officer came out of the station and then went back again. (Singh 121)

It is this that the people of the village were dumbfounded. The bloody scene of the trainload corpses was too horrible to even people like Hukum Chand, the police official. It unnerved him. He suffered from mental fatigue and cold numbness. His fear suggested the terror that blew in the atmosphere. His horror could not be mitigated even by the arrival of his sweetheart Haseena. This spectacle of violence sent shock waves throughout Mano Majra.

Khuswant Singh expresses of the monsoon, which increases “the tempo of life and death” (Singh 138). With the arrival of monsoon rains, Hukum Chand’s mind becomes obsessed with the brutalities committed on the frontiers. He realized that retaliation must follow. Hence, he became concerned with the safe evacuation of the Muslims of the locality. He told his sub-inspector, “These days one should be grateful for being alive. There is no peace anywhere. One trouble after another. . . .” (Singh 141). The tragic mood of the villagers was reflected through the vagaries of the monsoon, the late arrival of which left them high and dry since it did not bring relief but more disaster.

In the third section, the fact remains that “Mano Majra” which was the original title of the novel, Khuswant Singh continues to portray the village, which was once a symbol of peace and harmony, as a place of horror, hate, suspicion, and cowardice i.e. the village of goddess Kali. The train carrying the corpses of Hindus and Sikhs eventually disturbed the tranquility of the village. “When it was discovered,” writes Mr. Singh, “. . . that the train had brought a full load of corpses, a heavy brooding silence descended on the village. People barricaded their doors and many stayed up all night talking in whispers… When they woke up in the morning and saw it was raining, their first thoughts were about the train and burning corpses (Singh 164).

Meanwhile, the mental condition of the Muslims of the village was also precarious. The Muslims became all the more fearful as they heard exaggerated accounts of violence against their community.

Rumours of atrocities committed by Sikh on Muslims in Patiala, Ambala, and Kapurthala, which they had heard and dismissed, came back to their minds. They had heard of women having their veils taken off, being stripped and marched down crowded streets to be raped in the marketplace. Many had eluded there would be ravishers by killing themselves. They had heard of mosques being desecrated by the slaughter of pigs on the premises, and copies of the holy Koran being torn up by the infidels. (Singh 178)

With the rumours, the attitude of both communities suffered a radical change. Muslims grew suspicious of their neighbours. The Sikhs also became sullen and angry. Suddenly their conscience began to feel the weight of history, remembering the atrocities committed by the Muslim rulers on their Gurus and their family and followers. The memories of the past and the present experience conspired to turn them against their Muslim brothers.

V. DIVISION OF INDIAN COMMUNITY

It shows that the division between the two communities became so complete that the emotional appeal of Imam Baksh, the Muslim priest could not bridge it. Many arguments followed but Imam Baksh returned empty-handed. So did his daughter Nooran as she could not move Jugga’s mother to accept her as her daughter-in-law, even though she was going to be the mother of her son’s child. The Muslims had to leave. Even though the Sikhs felt helpless, on the eve of the departure of their Muslim friends, they were overwhelmed with emotion. Nevertheless, emotions like sympathy and fellow feeling are too weak to stand as a bulwark against the onslaught of communal fury. They do not make a lasting impression. No wonder by evening the people of Mano Majra forgot about the Muslims.

In the fourth section “Karma,” Khuswant Singh invokes the theory of Karma, central to Indian view life, to interpret the communal situation. However, he seems inclined to think that in many cases man does not suffer his misdeeds but for the misdeeds of others. For instance, Partition was the handiwork of a few politicians and the people who suffered had nothing to do with it. To build up his argument, Mr. Singh goes on to show how the situation further worsened with the arrival of the ghost trains. Such a tense situation, which prevailed in Mano Majra, was an ideal situation for the communal elements to operate. They exploited it to their fullest advantage, as they succeeded in inciting communal passions. Some strangers came to the Gurudwara on the jeep and began to mobilize the Sikhs of the village.

It is impossible to ignore that In the process of his arguments, their leaders mentioned the massacres at Rawalpindi, Multan, Gujranwala, and Sekhpura. Snearing the cowardly government of the moneylenders, they went on to teach the lesson of revenge, demanding an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth: “For each woman they abduct or rape, abduct two. For each home, they loot, loot two. For each trainload of the dead, they send over, send two across. For each road convoy that is attacked, attack two. That will stop the killing on the other side. It will teach them that we can also play this game of killing and looting” (Singh 222).

It is this that the communal situation became so tense and complicated that the well-meaning men like Meet Singh, Lambardar, and the police official Hukum Chand found themselves helpless to stem the tide of violence. Hukum Chand’s idea of fighting communalism with the help of criminals like Malli and Jugga and the immature and ineffectual politicians like Iqbal Singh was a wild goose chase. Singh while blaming the Sikhs and Muslims and the government officials for the communal frenzy, was ruthless severe on the politicians especially Nehru. He attacked them through his mouthpiece, Hukum Chand. He mockingly refers to Nehru and his famous speech on Independence Day:

“He is a great man, this Nehru of yours. I do think he is the greatest man in the world today. Moreover, how handsome! Wasn’t that a wonderful thing to say? “Long ago we made a tryst with destiny and now the time comes when we shall redeem our pledge, not wholly or in full measure but very substantially.” “Yes, Mr. Prime Minister, you made your trust. So did many others on the 15th of August, Independence Day.” (Singh 257- 258)

Then he went on to ruminate over the tryst with destiny made by people of his acquaintance. First of them was his colleague Prem Singh who went back to fetch his wife’s jewellery from Lahore and was killed. There was Sundari, the daughter of his orderly who also made a tryst with destiny on the road to Gujranwala. She had been married only four days ago and had hardly seen even the face of her husband. As she was travelling with her husband she was pulled from the bus along with her husband, raped, and killed.

In his case, Hukum Chand had to endure the ghastly sights of trainloads of massacred people and the corpse of butchered men, women, and children. He could not provide shelter even to his sweetheart Haseena. Hukum Chand was reduced from the powerful magistrate to a pathetic figure.

VI. CONCLUSION

However, Khuswant Singh ends his naturalistic novel with the heroic note of a romantic sacrifice. The communal situation demanded courage and the spirit of self-sacrifice of the highest order. While the so-called adherents of human values, Meet Singh, Lambardar, Iqbal, and Hukum Chand, could not muster enough courage to set their massive weight to confront communalism, Jugat Singh, a hardened criminal did it in his way. The Sikh sacrificed his life for the safety of his Muslim beloved Nooran. He slashed the rope, which was tied to stop the train, which was carrying her to Pakistan. Ostensibly, through Train to Pakistan, Khuswant Singh expressed his anger, disenchantment, and disillusionment with the prevalent social, religious, and political values during the Partition days. He was so upset by the harrowing events of 1947 that he lost faith in the values of peace and nonviolence.

“Train to Pakistan is a tragedy written in mock-comic tone, criticizing the celebration of freedom with mass murder and bestiality and ingeniously delineating the pity and horror of the two-nation theory” (Swain 123). It is “a nightmare with an exciting finish, one closes the novel with a sense of relief” (Iyengar 501). The aftermath of the partition evoked tears from Indian eyes, and it was a blot on the fair name of United British India.
REFERENCES

